mountains, and one of the bravest heroines of pioneer history. She was born in Philadelphia in 1732, her parents, George and Eleanor Draper, emigrating from Ireand the previous year. When she was eight years old they passed into the valley or Virginia, where she grew to womanhood, strong and vigorous. Tradi-i tion says that "she could leap a ditch or fence as readily as her brother, jump straight up almost as high as her head, or spring into her saddle from the ground unaided." This physical training made possible the terrible journey, a few years later, in which her life was at stake and

At sixteen, with her mother and brother, Mary Draper went to southwest Virthe little hamlet of Draper's Meadows, Their reputation is built on which was the first white settlement west They always give of the Allegheny mountains. It stood where the town of Blacksburg and Virginia Polytechnic Institute now stands. The expedition was led by Thomas Ingles, with his three sons, William, Matthew and John. He had been a wealthy merchant of London, trading in his own ships extensively with foreign countries, but his property being confiscated for political offenses, he came to America to build a Capture of Mrs. Ingles.

Five years passed. Everybody was prosperous and the Indians friendly, until suddenly, on the 8th of August, 1755, the day before Braddock's defeat, a party of Shewanees from beyond the Ohio fell upon the settlement, burning the buildings and killing, wounding or capturing every soul present. Mrs. Ingles, after seeing her mother tomahawked, was carried into captivity beyond the Ohjo, with her two small children, Thomas and George, her sister-in-law, Mrs. John Draper, and other settlers. On reaching the village of the Shewaness, a month later, the prisoners were divided, Thomas being sent to Detroit, George into the interior and Mrs. Ingles to Big Bone Lick, Boone county, Ky., to assist in making salt for the tribe.

It was a terrible grief to Mrs. Ingles that her helpless children were torn from her. She was alone with savage mensave for an old Dutch woman captured in Pennsylvania-hundreds of miles from other white people. To try to escape seemed to invite almost certain death, but she preferred death to the fate that awaited her, and the brave-hearted young wife determined to make the attempt. Rather than be left alone with the Indians the old Dutch woman at last agreed to accompany Mrs. Ingles, though she pleaded with her not to undertake so perilous a journey. There were no roads, no guides; death by starvation and exposure, by wild beasts and wild Indians menaced them on every hand, but the two women, each with a tomahawk and blanket, turned their faces home-
